GLASGOW TRADES HALL, Merchant City

This splendid building was designed and built in 1791-4 by Robert Adam and his brothers to serve as the meeting place for the Trades House (founded 1605), the incorporation of Glasgow's fourteen crafts. It is claimed to be the second oldest building in Glasgow still to be used for its original purpose.

SLHF CONFERENCE

The Butcher, the Baxter and the Candlemaker - Trades and Crafts in Scotland, medieval to modern

Thursday 31 October 2013

10.15-16.30

Glasgow Trades Hall

85 Glassford Street, Glasgow

Glasgow Trades Hall in Merchant City, is the stunning and appropriately themed venue for this conference which explores several aspects of Scotland's trades and crafts and their links with local history. The first part of the programme focuses on trade guilds and incorporations, with talks on sources for apprenticeship and other records, the establishment of settlements on trade lands in, for example, Elgin and Perth, and trade emblems on buildings and gravestones.

During the extended lunch break volunteers from Glasgow Trades House will give half-hour tours of the building (must be booked in advance). Also the small museum of artefacts and regalia relating to the Glasgow Trades House will be open.

In the afternoon the theme expands to non-incorporated trades and the period after the trade guilds lost their monopoly in 1832, with examples from Paisley to Aberdeen. When standards declined with the advent of mass production, arts schools, such as Glasgow School of Art, in the later 19th century aimed to encourage improvements in craft design. Our last talk brings the theme of crafts full circle, linking modern carving with the history of the craft.

The conference will interest local, family and social historians, and non-members are most welcome.
